

Logic.

A clock is a machine. A gear is a tool. There is rarely any joy in a frictionless place, so find your inner viscosity.

The mind says viscosity is resistance to flow. The body puts glue on a twig and catches a bird. Glue is a tool, unless you are a bird. If you are a bird, then glue is an inconvenience. A tool does work. A bird flies away from danger and lands where it can. All thinking is comparison. A bear is a weapon, a bear claw is a pastry. A bear trap, if you are a bear, is an inconvenience.

Logic is boring because it works. Being unreasonable is exciting. Machines have knobs you can turn if you want to. A hammer is a hammer when it hits the nail.

A hammer is not a hammer when it is sleeping. I woke up tired of being the hammer. There's a dream in the space between the hammer and the nail: the dream of about-to-be-hit, which is a bad dream, but the nail will take the hit if it gets to sleep inside the wood forever.

I taped a sword to my hand when I was younger. This is an argument about goals.
